Why Choose to be a Physical Therapy Aide

The Job of the Future

The demand for physical therapy aides is expected to increase in the future, reflecting the rapid growth in the healthcare industry due to a population that is increasing in number as well as climbing in age. The elderly population, those who have suffered from heart attacks and strokes, trauma victims, and newborns with birth defects will all greatly benefit from cardiac or physical rehabilitation and therapeutic services.

The Career

Physical therapy aides help physical therapists and physical therapist assistants to provide treatments to patients that improve mobility, relieve pain, and prevent or lessen physical disabilities. Typical job responsibilities include keeping the treatment area clean and organized and preparing for patient appointments. They may also help transport patients from one treatment area to another and perform clerical and administrative duties.

Job Opportunities

Physical therapy aides work in a variety of settings, including home healthcare services, nursing care facilities, general and medical surgical hospitals, and offices of physicians and other health practitioners, including other orthopedic practices.

Employment Outlook

Physical therapy is a growing field with great prospects for physical therapy aides, who help physical therapists to manage more patients. The employment outlook for physical therapy aides is better than the average for all occupations; the projected job growth in this field is expected to be up to 41% by 2022. (U.S. Department of Labor Statistics, 2014-2015 Occupational Outlook Handbook)

What You Can Earn

The U.S. Department of Labor Statistics lists the middle 50 percent of physical therapy aides earning up to $23,480. Working for a nursing care facility resulted in the highest median annual wages for industries that employ the largest numbers of physical therapy aides.
